Romulea
Spring-Summer
2027

Rome in spring unfolds like a love letter, ancient stone meeting wild nature, monumental architecture giving way to delicate flora, the golden warmth of the sun turning the city into a dreamscape.

This collection is inspired by Rome at the moment of awakening, when winter softens into spring and the city begins to bloom. It explores the beauty found in the contrast between man-made grandeur and untamed nature: terracotta buildings glowing beneath the sun, weathered walls softened by climbing greenery, gardens opening onto fields of wildflowers, ancient trees casting long shadows across Roman streets.

The city's parks become central to this story. The gardens surrounding historic villas and the quieter green spaces tucked throughout the city, offer a gentler, more romantic view of Rome. Beneath the pines and cypress trees, wild grasses move in the breeze, and tiny flowers appear along the pathways: poppies, daisies, irises, roses, romuleas, dandelions, small bursts of yellow and red scattered against the deep greens of spring foliage, forming something like a painted landscape. The collection draws from this meeting of controlled and uncontrolled beauty: the symmetry of Italian gardens against the freedom of wildflowers pushing through cracks in ancient stone, carefully constructed fountains and columns and stairways and arches standing alongside climbing vines, flowering branches, moss and grass. Nature doesn't erase the architecture here, it softens it until it becomes part of the architecture itself.

The faded yellows, dusty terracottas, burnt oranges and soft blushes of Roman façades echo buildings lit by the late-afternoon sun. Walls shift between sun-washed peach and warm rose, their surfaces changing with age and light while the green of cypress, olive, umbrella pine, and wild grass sets a striking contrast against them.
The flowers bring in a more delicate palette: wild rose, lavender, soft violet, butter yellow, poppy red, creamy white, dusty pink, colours that appear almost fleetingly, like small fragments discovered while walking through the city.

Above it all is the extraordinary Roman light. In early morning, it's pale and silvery, settling over the city with a quiet stillness. By midday, it turns bright and glowing, revealing every texture: stone, plaster, leaf, petal. And by evening, the light warms into amber, bathing the buildings in gold and turning terracotta walls into shades of rose and copper.
